

CONFIDENTIAL

(9 September 1996)

1. The negotiations which started on 10 June are to secure an overall political settlement and will address all the issues relevant to that. They are intended to be inclusive, involving both Governments and all the relevant political parties with the necessary democratic mandate and commitment to exclusively peaceful methods.

2. The prospects for success in these negotiations will be greatly enhanced if they are conducted in a peaceful environment. Under the relevant legislation, if the Government considers that there is an unequivocal restoration of the IRA ceasefire of August 1994, Sinn Féin will be invited to nominate a team to participate in the negotiations. Beyond that, the two Governments are agreed that these negotiations are without preconditions.

3. It is equally clear that, to be successful, the negotiations must be peaceful, based on exclusively democratic and peaceful means and without recourse to the threat (actual or implied) or use of violence or coercion. On entry to the negotiations, each participant needs therefore to make clear their total and absolute commitment to the principles of democracy and non-violence set out in the Report of the International Body.

4. The spectrum of issues on which an overall agreement is dependent means that the negotiations will be on the basis of a comprehensive agenda, adopted by agreement, with each participant able to raise any significant issue of concern to them and receive a fair hearing for those concerns without their ability to do so being subject to the veto of any other party in the negotiations. Any participant in the format in question will be free to raise any aspect of the three relationships, including constitutional issues and any other matter which it considers relevant. No negotiated outcome is either predetermined or excluded in advance or limited by anything other than the need for agreement.

5. As the communique of 28 February made clear, the opening plenary will also address the International Body's proposals on decommissioning. At that stage, the Government, along with the Irish Government, will be seeking the commitment of all participants to work constructively during the negotiations to implement all aspects of the International Body's report, including its compromise approach under which some decommissioning would take place during the process of negotiations. The Government wishes to make urgent progress in this area so that the process of decommissioning, rather than being regarded as a precondition to further progress, is used to build confidence one step at a time during the negotiations. As progress is made on political issues, even modest mutual steps on decommissioning could help create the atmosphere needed for further steps in a progressive pattern of mounting trust and confidence.

6. All parties are treated equally in the negotiations in accordance with the scale of their democratic mandate. No party has an undemocratic advantage.

7. It has been accepted that all participants will negotiate in good faith, seriously address all aspects of the agreed agenda and make every effort to reach a comprehensive agreement. For their part, the two Governments are committed to seek to ensure that all items on the comprehensive agenda are fully addressed and to do so themselves with a view to overcoming any obstacles which may arise.

8. The British Government is wholly committed to upholding, so far as we are able, our responsibility to encourage, facilitate and enable the achievement of agreement in the negotiations based on full respect for the rights and identities of both traditions. Our primary interest is to see peace, stability and reconciliation established by agreement among all the people who inhabit the island of Ireland.

9. The Government, for our part, is determined to see these negotiations through successfully, as speedily as possible. This is at one with the hopes and aspirations of people throughout these islands, which have already sustained a momentum in a process which will always have its difficulties. The Government has already proposed that a meeting of the plenary should be held at a suitable date to take stock of progress in the negotiations as a whole. It will support any agreed timeframe for the conduct of the negotiations adopted by the participants.

10. We are committed to raising confidence through the talks process and through a range of other measures alongside it. The International Body's report itself proposes a process of mutual confidence-building.

11. The Government will continue to pursue social and economic policies informed by the principles of equality of opportunity, equity of treatment and parity of esteem irrespective of political, cultural or religious affiliation or gender. We are committed to enhancing community identification with policing in Northern Ireland, and to a wide-ranging process of policing reform.

12. In response to the ceasefires of Autumn 1994, the Government undertook a series of confidence-building measures in response to the changed level of threat, including changed arrangements for release of prisoners, security force redeployments, a review of emergency legislation and others. If the threat reduces again, the opportunity for further confidence-building measures returns.

13. Confidence-building is a two-way street. Support for the use of violence is incompatible with participation in the democratic process. An end to punishment beatings and other paramilitary activities, including surveillance and targeting, is needed to underpin a commitment to peaceful methods and help build trust.

14. The opportunity for progress has never been greater. The negotiations command wide support internationally and have the benefit of independent chairmen from the USA, Canada and Finland. They have the overwhelming support of people throughout these islands, who also greatly desire that they take place in a peaceful environment, free of all paramilitary violence.

Thank you for your letter of 8 August and the text which you passed on 8 September.

The IRA's position, as you describe it, is that if we were ready to make this statement, and the IRA knew when we were going to make it, they would respond shortly afterwards, at a time specified in advance, with an unequivocal renunciation of the August 1994 "ceasefire".

When I wrote to you on 26 July I said that the IRA should restore their ceasefire without any further preconditions. But, in response to the suggestion that commitments from the British Government on certain issues in line with the established British policy would help in bringing this about, I set out points which should be used. Nothing happened.

We have returned with at least one more issue - the spectrum, which is simply not under our control - and an altogether longer statement covering a host of issues. Meanwhile we have continued preparation for further IRA attacks given the fact that such attacks risk shattering whatever prospects there may be for restoring the peace process.

The Government is not in the business of negotiating a deal out of the IRA ceasefire, nor in giving secret assurances to anyone about. Sinn Féin must understand that we need to publish our position in public.
